

It is outrageous to read that the FCC is considering striking a blow against the small-business ISPs who helped build the internet. If high speed services are entirely in the hands of large communications monopolies, the incentive to innovation will be destroyed and the internet may well become a cess-pool of inefficiency. As an agency of an administration which is supposed to be small-business friendly, the FCC should reject this grab for control. The internet, like the airwaves, is supposed to belong to the people.
